This babe has it all

Sizzling and Served: Jade Seah, 22, student

By Skye Tan
skyetan@sph.com.sg

She’s probably one of those girls you like to hate... Pretty, tall (1.72m) and blessed with genes that don’t require her to diet, Jade Seah is also a high-flier at school.

The Singapore Management University business student represented the school at a prestigious branding competition last year and is doing an internship with top marketing communications company Ogilvy Public Relations Worldwide.

She excels even at play, having represented the university at inter-varsity wakeboarding competitions over the last two years. She has also played inter-school netball since her secondary school days.

The sporty lass — who doesn’t hit the gym — also inline-skates and likes dancing up a storm at Zouk.

But sorry guys, she’s taken.

What’s the worst pick-up line you have heard?
Let me think of the worst... OK, you know those guys who thumb in “can I be your friend” on their handphones, then pass you the phone to show it to you? A bad pick-up line is worse when you don’t even vocalise it.

Do you think that the age-old allegation that Singaporean men are boring and unattractive is true?
I actually like Singaporean guys. It’s a matter of personal preference but I’m not attracted to Caucasians and among the Asian countries, I think Singaporean guys are the least chauvinistic.

We hear of people overseas going under the knife to help them to secure better jobs. Do you think good looks matter when it comes to getting hired?
I got my internship by writing in uninvited and didn’t even send a photo. Looks do matter when it comes to first impressions, but you always have to prove yourself.

Do people assume you are a bimbo because you are hot?
When I do well in school, I have heard of friends or friends of friends being... surprised. Maybe it’s not just because of the way I look but, you know, it’s like the big boobs theory, where if you are chesty, you are presumed to be airy on top. Thank God I don’t have big boobs! (laughs)