No better way

FOR now, good grades are the most realistic method of entry into a university because there is no alternative benchmark to gauge the potential of an applicant based only on an application essay or a 20-minute interview.

Meeting the basic requirements does not entitle one to a college education, just as every Grade 8 music student is not granted entry into the prestigious Julliard School.

If there’s anything that is more disappointing than getting rejected, it’s finding out that what you’ve worked for tirelessly was not worth the effort after all.

So, my question is, if they don’t want you, why should you want them?

Alicia Ng, 23, is a third-year accounting student at the Singapore Management University