A tool for interaction

I MAY not have many friends on social networking site Friendster, but I do not view the number as a gauge of my popularity.

These numbers represent people whom I know personally. We share common interests, and the website is an avenue of congregation.

A simple search online shows me how they have changed and what they are up to currently.

But make no mistake, online or offline, real friends are those who stand by you in times of need, not those who just make up the numbers.

Ephraim Loy, 24, is a first-year social science student at the Singapore Management University