IT USED to be simpler. Every five years or so, Singapore’s ruling party would replenish its ranks with new blood. It would highlight its track record and promise more good times ahead. And the people – partly because the opposition seemed less than desirable or lacked credentials – would respond by giving the People’s Action Party (PAP) a strong mandate at the polls.

This year, looming concerns over the rising cost of living, and a widening income gap amid an influx of foreign workers, this election is expected to be the most widely contested since 1997.

The PAP is pitching the polls as a means for Singapore to install its fourth generation of leaders who will produce the next prime minister. A strong mandate for its leaders, it says, is crucial to Singapore’s social compact: It reinforces the meritocratic ethos of our society and gives hope to less well-off Singaporeans.

In the outcome of this election, say political observers, Social mobility is an important component of Singapore’s social compact. It reinforces the meritocratic ethos of our society and gives hope to less well-off Singaporeans.

Beyond steady gross domestic product growth, which Singaporeans now regard as a given – hard questions are being asked about the purpose of growth and distribution of the fruits of growth.

Still, it has not stopped questions being raised by the public and politicians about the commitment of these candidates. What makes someone appeal to these people’s sense of loyalty in assisting in their country’s evolution?

Commenting on the returnees, political analyst Derek da Cunha says: “These people have rekindled their Singaporean citizenship should be viewed as a plus point for the country, as occasions may arise when we may have to appeal to these people’s sense of loyalty in assisting in their country’s evolution.”

IT IS living here? Or is it raising your children in a politically apolitical city with a sizeable diaspora?

This GE, said to determine the national interest mean? What is the real purpose of growth? What does voting in the national interest really mean?

IT USED to be simpler. Once every five years or so, Singapore's ruling party would replenish its ranks with new blood. It would highlight its track record and promise more good times ahead. And the people -- partly because the opposition seemed less than desirable or lacked credentials -- would respond by giving the People's Action Party (PAP) a strong mandate at the polls.

This year, looming concerns over the rising cost of living, and a widening income gap amid an influx of foreign workers, this election is expected to be the most widely contested since 1997.

The PAP is pitching the polls as a means for Singapore to install its fourth generation of leaders who will produce the next prime minister. A strong mandate for its leaders, it says, is crucial to Singapore's social compact: It reinforces the meritocratic ethos of our society and gives hope to less well-off Singaporeans.

In the outcome of this election, say political observers, Social mobility is an important component of Singapore's social compact. It reinforces the meritocratic ethos of our society and gives hope to less well-off Singaporeans.

Beyond steady gross domestic product growth, which Singaporeans now regard as a given -- hard questions are being asked about the purpose of growth and distribution of the fruits of growth.

Still, it has not stopped questions being raised by the public and politicians about the commitment of these candidates. What makes someone appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution?

Commenting on the returnees, political analyst Derek da Cunha says: "These people have rekindled their Singaporean citizenship should be viewed as a plus point for the country, as occasions may arise when we may have to appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution."

Still, it has not stopped questions being raised by the public and politicians about the commitment of these candidates. What makes someone appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution?

Commenting on the returnees, political analyst Derek da Cunha says: "These people have rekindled their Singaporean citizenship should be viewed as a plus point for the country, as occasions may arise when we may have to appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution."

Still, it has not stopped questions being raised by the public and politicians about the commitment of these candidates. What makes someone appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution?

Commenting on the returnees, political analyst Derek da Cunha says: "These people have rekindled their Singaporean citizenship should be viewed as a plus point for the country, as occasions may arise when we may have to appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution."

Still, it has not stopped questions being raised by the public and politicians about the commitment of these candidates. What makes someone appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution?

Commenting on the returnees, political analyst Derek da Cunha says: "These people have rekindled their Singaporean citizenship should be viewed as a plus point for the country, as occasions may arise when we may have to appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution."

Still, it has not stopped questions being raised by the public and politicians about the commitment of these candidates. What makes someone appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution?

Commenting on the returnees, political analyst Derek da Cunha says: "These people have rekindled their Singaporean citizenship should be viewed as a plus point for the country, as occasions may arise when we may have to appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution."

Still, it has not stopped questions being raised by the public and politicians about the commitment of these candidates. What makes someone appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution?

Commenting on the returnees, political analyst Derek da Cunha says: "These people have rekindled their Singaporean citizenship should be viewed as a plus point for the country, as occasions may arise when we may have to appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution."

Still, it has not stopped questions being raised by the public and politicians about the commitment of these candidates. What makes someone appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution?

Commenting on the returnees, political analyst Derek da Cunha says: "These people have rekindled their Singaporean citizenship should be viewed as a plus point for the country, as occasions may arise when we may have to appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution."

Still, it has not stopped questions being raised by the public and politicians about the commitment of these candidates. What makes someone appeal to these people's sense of loyalty in assisting in their country's evolution?