Global warming, environmental degradation, terrorism, inter-cultural conflicts, social divisions and financial turbulence. We live in extraordinary times. How do we understand the challenges around us and the way human beings formulate decisions to address the problems as the world becomes more globalised and knowledge-driven? A broad-based and multi-disciplinary Social Science approach is learning and thinking through the study of psychology, political science and sociology provides a useful key to unlock these complex problems. The new generation of Social Science graduates who will assume senior leadership and management roles in multiple career paths, including the government, the corporate world or the not-for-profit sector, has to be versatile and innovative. They need a well-rounded education that combines theory and practice with academic rigor and the opportunities of learning by doing. Are you ready to join them?
